Adventure with a Venomous serpent

The for de-lence (frigomocomains lacoutlatus) is closely allied to the rattlesaske, and is perhaps one of the most deadly serpents in lighter below. The jaws are of soormous thicknoss. It varies from dull sandy grey to dusky brown is color, very difficult to distinguish from the ground on which it nes, with irregular, indistant, diamond shaped markings of a laded purplish has about the sides; the tosles are strongly impricate, and 'keeled' or sharely reed along the back, while in length it measures from two to eight or ten feet. Its great recultarily, however, is the claw or heroy nail at the end of the tai; this is. like our finger calls, an approdage of the skie, and may be considered the rattle of the true crosslas to a anoimentary condition. Mr. Arthur Strading, writing to the Field, says: "I taysett occabrought to England its o ngener, the deady curueucu of Brezi (the only one that has ever resented Europe alive.) two repiles being nardly distinguishable from one souther; but
